The World Heath Organization (WHO) has officially listed 'gaming disorder' or gaming addiction as an illness. This was part of a big update to the International Classification of the diseases around the world. The

WHO said that gaming disorder, especially among youths, brings about a harmful technology-related pattern of behaviour where priority is given to gaming over all other activities. A person is described as such when they are unable to stop playing, despite the negative effects this might be having on their health and life.

Gaming disorder doesn't just mean a youth might play video games a bit too much. It is classified as a more serious condition when it has a very negative impact on their life. It can be identified by such symptoms as ¹ impaired control over gaming, ² increased priority given to gaming to the extent that it takes precedence over other life interests and daily activities like eating, washing, going to the toilet or even leaving the house, ³ and the continuation of gaming and the inability to stop, despite its having a significant negative impact on their personal well-being, family, schoolwork or work life. In order for a person to be officially diagnosed with such a disorder, they must show all of the above symptoms, to a very extreme level, for at least 12 months.

- Gaming is one of the most popular hobbies around the world, with millions of people, especially children and teenagers, playing video games every single day. However, when it becomes an addiction and a person loses control over their ability to stop and take care of themselves, it can become a real issue. Countries such as China and South Korea currently have a big problem with gaming disorder. They have set up special military-like camps where parents can send their children if they want to help them handle their gaming addictions; but these have been criticised for using extreme disciplinary measures and inflicting harsh punishment.
- Video game organisations like the ESA, ISFE and UKIE have spoken out about the new definition. They said that more research needs to be done and that perhaps gaming disorder might be part of another mental health problem, such as depression or anxiety. But the WHO said that the decision to make gaming disorder an official illness was based on research by health professionals from all over the world, and that by labelling it, it means that doctors will be able to offer help and treatment to those who are suffering from this issue.
